This week we're breaking the rules a little bit. It seems unfair to rank some of Canada's top givers, so instead we're giving you 10 Canadian philanthropists in no particular order. Each person on our list is committed to contributing to the quality of life throughout Canadian communities whether it's the arts, culture, sports, education or environment.

Top 10

Paul Martin

He created the Martin Aboriginal Education Initiative, which is a Montreal-based charitable organization. The charity's mission is to improve educational outcomes among Aboriginal youth as well as eliminating the disparities between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians.

James Hughes

In Canada more than 70 per cent of people with a mental health problem or illness are struck with it when they are in their adolescence and early adulthood. Hughes, president of the Graham Broeckh Foundation is helping to install early intervention with any young person with early onset mental illness.

Belinda Stronach

She started her own foundation that builds partnerships with individuals, non-governmental organizations, governments and businesses to fix issues facing girls and women and Aboriginal youth in developing nations. Together they develop programs that will enhance basic health and education among those in need.

Seymour Schulich

Thanks to Schulich, next year 40 young Canadians will be heading into their first year of university with a large financial boost from his scholarship fund which was started in 2011 and encourages high school students to embrace STEM disciplines in their future careers. To date, the scholarship has impacted 120 students from across Canada with $7.6 million invested in Canadian students.

Mike Lazaridis

He's the co-founder of Blackberry but it's not all about business with him. A few years ago he launched Perimeter Institute for Theoretical Physics which is philanthropy on a major scale - he spent millions on the project so students who love physics can have an institute of their own.

Randall Moffatt

He believes "a Canadian society where all individuals have equal opportunity to develop their potential," should exist. In 2001 he donated $100 million to the Winnipeg Foundation, Canada's first community foundation.

Leslie and Irene Dubé

These two are leaders in charitable giving in Saskatchewan. In 2011, the Dubés made a $10 million donation to the University of Saskatchewan Health Sciences Project and have given million dollar gifts to healthcare facilities including the Children's Hospital of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon City Hospital, and several others.

George Reed

He's made his name in football, but now he's making a name for himself in philanthropy. He's been associated with many charities, including his own George Reed Foundation which holds a strong focus on helping the disabled and disadvantaged who are physically and intellectually challenged.

Abirami Kirubarajan

This youth was awarded the title of Canada's Top Teen Philanthropist in 2013. From Ontario, she founded the PMC Youth Advisory which helps immigrated youth integrate into Canadian culture while overcoming the stresses of integration. To date, the program has instilled confidence in more than 600 students.

You

From donating a dollar to the I Bought A Lunch campaign to donating money toward the Five Hills Health Foundation's Capital Campaign, it seems like every person in the community is doing their part to make Moose Jaw stronger and more sustainable. Although a dollar donation doesn't get the recognition a $100,000 donation gets, every dollar helps and every dollar is appreciated.

Quick question

How do you think Stephen Harper will be remembered as a Prime Minister?

- He was one of the best.
- He was one of the worst.
- He was fairly average.
